DISSERTATION

How the Power of Business Affects the Commercial Peace: Commercial Interests, Economic Interdependence, and Militarized Conflict.

The literature on the commercial peace — economic interdependence reduces interstate militarized disputes — has yet to explain how international commerce impacts domestic politics to produce pacific foreign policy. I argue that the effectiveness of economic interdependence to reduce international conflict depends on the degree of influence the business community has on national policy-making. My findings demonstrate that the interaction of bilateral trade with the size of the private sector substantially decreases the use of military force and the escalation of hostilities. Detailed process tracing studies of the Colombia - Venezuela and China - Japan rivalries further explore the nuanced effects of the domestic bargaining process between commercial elites and the state on security policy.
